SAT Intended Use Policy

If you're not taking the SAT for one of its intended purposes, you can register only for certain dates.

Otherwise, your registration may be canceled.

You may take the test on any of the seven weekend administrations if one or more of these conditions apply:

- You plan to apply to a college or university undergraduate program.
- You plan to apply for a scholarship, financial aid, or other program that requires a college admission test as part of the application process.

If you're taking the SAT as part of a state- or district-funded test administration, you may take the test on a school day, or if applicable, on the state- or district-designated weekend administration date.

Those interested in taking the SAT for other reasons may take it only during administrations where the SAT form is disclosed after the test:

- Individuals wishing to test in the U.S. can choose from the October, March, and May administrations.

If we have reason to believe a test taker is not taking the SAT for its intended purposes, we will cancel their registration. In addition, College Board reserves the right to investigate and cancel the SAT registration and/or scores of anyone suspected of attempting to steal and/or share test content.

College Board reviews SAT Weekend registrations to ensure students are taking the exam for one of the intended purposes. If you get a verification form requesting more information about why you're testing, please provide detailed responses to all questions.

If you don't complete the form or if we believe you're not taking the SAT for one of its intended purposes, we'll cancel your registration and refund any fees.
